ABOUT ME

I am Md. Abul Kalam Azad, a dedicated lecturer in the Department of Anatomy and Histology at Habiganj Agricultural University. I hold a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine (DVM) from Patuakhali Science and Technology University and an MS in Anatomy from Bangladesh Agricultural University, with a focus on veterinary anatomical studies and their applications to animal health.

With a passion for advancing veterinary science, I have contributed significantly to research, particularly exploring natural interventions in livestock and poultry health. My published work includes a Q2 journal article on marine macroalgae (Enteromorpha intestinalis), demonstrating its positive effects on broiler growth, meat quality, and serum biochemical parameters. This research underscores my commitment to sustainable, innovative animal management practices.

In addition to my academic and research endeavors, I have gained valuable practical experience in the poultry industry, serving as a research assistant at BAURES and the LDDP project. As an active member of the Bangladesh Veterinary Council, I strive to foster academic excellence through dynamic teaching methods, while also developing practical solutions to local animal health challenges. My goal is to bridge the gap between academic knowledge and real-world applications, contributing to the sustainable growth of veterinary science in Bangladesh.
